

COVID-19 Summary of European Governments Financial Support

Executive Summary

While there has been much public focus on the measures European governments have taken to try to contain the spread of the coronavirus disease 2019 (COVID-19) by restricting circulation and closing down aspects of economic life, every government has a second critical objective: to preserve as much of the fabric of the economy (e.g. solvent companies with employees who can respond immediately to demand when it returns) as possible.

Put bluntly, if factories and plants close and those who work there are made redundant, it takes a great deal longer for that capacity in the economy to be re-activated. The calculation governments have made is that it is worth paying – a lot – to preserve that productive capacity.

The numbers are eye-wateringly large. Governments of all political persuasions are nationalising large swathes of the economy, at least temporarily, and in many cases, becoming employers of last resort. But lift the lid and you see a very wide range of measures. The very largest sums tend to be loans not grants, though on favourable terms. Loans do not add to the national debt in the way that grants do. But there are grants as well – governments have recognised that loading virtually the entire private sector with abnormal debt would create as much of a problem for government as it would for businesses. Alongside the loans and grants, you also find deferrals of tax and other payments – which, with extremely low interest rates, are close to cost free to government.

Governments can help a company's cash position in three ways – by giving it money, by lending it money and by relieving it of some bills. European governments are doing a mix of all three.

They are doing some other things, too, to try to keep companies in business. Like temporarily relieving Directors of some Duties, including not to trade if you are not financially viable. Or suspending redundancy or insolvency processes. The message is clear: keep your company in being, even if it is not doing anything. Are the measures announced likely to achieve that? In varying degrees, probably yes. But they are also storing up significant problems for the future, and not just of government debt. Decisions taken by corporates to access relief schemes come with conditions in some countries. And all such decisions may come under scrutiny in the future after the crisis is past, with the potential for litigation or regulatory intervention. How forgiving will society be if the private sector is seen after the crisis to have just looked after itself (despite preserving the fabric of the economy being a clear government objective)?

Free money is never free. In some cases, this support comes with explicit conditions; in other cases, with expectations. But in all cases, company boards will need to consider carefully which support schemes are best, and how best to access them, in the expectation of future scrutiny.

<sup>3</sup> Considering that the UK is currently under the transition period of its withdrawal from the EU, EU law remains applicable to the UK. Thus, the UK's eligibility for such funding remains and, as such, it is aligned with the remaining UK's contribution to the EU budget.

<sup>4</sup> As marketable risks can be temporarily unavailable due to the current crisis, member states may use the exemption for non-marketable risks of paragraph 18 (d) of the Communication from the Commission on short-term export-credit insurance: "if the Commission, after having received a notification from a Member State, decides that due to a shortage of export-credit insurance, certain risks are temporarily non-marketable for exporters in the notifying Member State." A marketable risk as defined under the communication is "commercial and political risks with a maximum risk period of less than two years, on public and non-public buyers of all Member States, Australia, Canada, Iceland, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Switzerland, United States of America."
