About Matthew

Matthew Croxford is a dual Australian and New Zealand-qualified lawyer whose practice focuses on competition and consumer law and regulation. Matthew's experience includes several years in merger control and leading investigations into alleged consumer law breaches.

Having worked for a national competition regulator for several years prior to joining our firm, Matthew draws on this experience to provide clients with strategic insight, planning and advice when engaging with regulators.

Experience

- Assessing complex merger clearance applications, an authorisation application and a merger enforcement investigation that resulted in a NZD$420,000 penalty.
- Assessing mergers in a wide range of sectors, such as electricity, healthcare, transport, logistics, telecommunications and financial/cash distribution.
- Assessing alleged misuse of market power.
- Managing significant and complex investigations into allegations of misleading pricing and promotional practices by large, sophisticated businesses.
- Contributing to additional consumer law matters relating to allegations of misleading and deceptive conduct, unsubstantiated representations and false or misleading representations.
- Compelling parties to provide information and documents, as well as attend interviews in accordance with the regulator's statutory powers.
- Undertaking investigations into market participants, including gathering, testing and assessing evidence in legally, economically and commercially nuanced contexts.
- Analysing the legal, economic and evidential issues arising from merger assessment applications and providing recommendations, while having regard to statutory and internal timeframes.
